Director's Letter

Welcome to our latest newsletter, packed full of engaging stories from our recent work with young people and our latest thinking.

In "Open the Jar", Anna explores the power of empathy in helping young people. It's not about taking sides; it's about fostering an environment for growth and understanding.

Tim shines a light on anxiety, particularly performance anxiety in "Anxiety and the smoke alarm". He offers practical advice and reassures us that feeling anxious sometimes is part of being human.

"No drama, it's drama", takes you to our drama group at Prince William School. Here, a shared passion for drama has sparked important conversations about life, relationships, and wellbeing among our young people.

"The ask-it basket" details our journey from a casual question about pasta to profound discussions about life, wealth, and faith. It underscores that the power of questioning can inspire young minds and stimulate curiosity.

These articles have a common thread. They highlight the importance of engaging young people in meaningful conversations. Whether seemingly trivial or complex, their questions unlock new understanding. Responding with empathy and respect allows us to foster trust and mutual learning. It all starts with listening well.

We are proud of our work and it's positive impact. We know the value of fostering open conversations, promoting mental well-being, and supporting young people in their flourishing.

We're also excited to announce a job opening for maternity cover for my PA. This is a wonderful opportunity to join our brilliant team. You'll find more info on page 12. Do share this with others who may be interested.

Thanks for your support and interest in our work,

Jason Royce leads the work of Souster Youth.

Meet lan

SY: Tell us about yourself.

I am married to Claire and we have three children in their 20s. I like running and am about to run my first half-marathon, as a late starter at the age of 57! I'm an optician and I attend a church in Raunds.

SY: What do you enjoy about volunteering?

I like being with the young people: having fun, engaging in conversation and hearing their stories, as well as listening (and sometimes madly dancing!) to music. I also enjoy being part of a fun team with a collaborative leader.

SY: So why Souster Youth?

Souster takes a holistic view of the wellbeing of young people: socially, spiritually and emotionally. This ties in with my own beliefs as to how to help a young person be the best person that they can be.

SY: What's been one highlight for you?

Through volunteering with Souster Youth I helped lead a course on 'sex and relationships' at a local school.

SY: What's one random/funny thing that has happened?

I invented a silly game involving a table tennis table and a large sponge football. The young people got so overexcited with it that they accidentally broke my glasses!

SY: Working with young people is like being an optician because...

No two eyes are ever exactly the same and no two young people are ever the same either!

44 The young people got so overexcited with it that they accidentally broke my glasses!

Each term we support the social and emotional wellbeing of young people in schools. The Grow Intervention helps young people to open up and find coping strategies for the challenges that they face in life. Anna Freij shares about the impact upon one young person this term. >>

>>When Freddie* was referred to Souster Youth, he had been through a number of difficult circumstances over the past few years that were having a profound impact upon his wellbeing.

Freddie first started experiencing acute anxiety when he was in year 4. The pressures from his peers over social media left Freddie feeling worried that he could not be accepted by others. To make matters worse, someone who had previously been a friend to Freddie began severely bullying him online during the CV-19 lockdown.

Freddie had to move schools as his parents separated and each moved to a different part of the country. Freddie said their eventual divorce left him with "a black hole inside of me - I felt empty." Freddie found the move of location really difficult, especially leaving his friends behind. And then Freddie's grandfather passed away, compounding his experiences of grief and loss.

All of these experiences had a profound impact upon Freddie's wellbeing. When we began working with him he was having difficulty sleeping and our assessment indicated probable depression. He wanted to feel less anxious and to be more confident. We helped him process all that he had been through by giving Freddie space to mourn. He described this process as like "being able to open the jar [of grief]".

We also shared with Freddie techniques for helping with sleep and anxiety. He put these into practice very creatively, even imaginging situations in which he might be anxious in order to try out the techniques. His sleep began to improve and this had a positive effect upon his mood and outlook.

Being part of an accepting group was also a significantly positive factor for Freddie. He told us afterwards: "It's really helped me having people I can trust." The group element is a powerful dynamic of the Grow Intervention. Freddie's experience reminds me of the importance to mourn with those that mourn<sup>1</sup>.

Freddie sums up the changes in him like this: "I feel more confident and wake up looking forward to my day. I used to be upset every day before school but since this group I've not been upset before school once. I feel really hopeful."

QUOTES FROM THIS TERM

"It's been really helpful: it helps me control my anger using methods to relax. I have started to slow down when I feel angry; I understand what to do when that happens now."

"Before Souster, I had lots of behaviour points at school, but since this group I've hardly had any. I've been walking away from people that annoy me. My Mum is so pleased with me that she bought me a big tube of sweets!"

"Letting it all out has been good. It feels so much better talking about problems. It's been helpful knowing that it's okay to be sad, because other people get sad too."

"I used to be aggressive 24/7, but I've been more calm, chilled out. I've started to stop and think what I want to do and what decision I want to make. If it's my fault, I apologise. If it's not, I try to speak to the other person."

"It's been good, amazing. It's the best thing we have done in this school!"

No drama, it's drama!

>> I've always loved drama and it's been amazing this year to be able to put my drama skills to use supporting young people.

Six months ago we started a lunch time drama group for year 7s in Prince William School with a view to getting to know some of the young people prior to opening the Drop-in at the Souster Hub. We had no idea where this would end up but we had spoken to a few year 7s in lessons who liked drama so thought we'd have a go!

The first week no one came. Not a single person.

The second week Jason and I were about to give up hope when we overheard two girls talking about how they had come to find the drama group. From there, every week the group has grown and grown, as young people have told their friends about us and brought them along as well. We now have an average of 15 young people attending each week!

It has been so great to watch this group grow and to see the relationships grow too. We have used our creative drama skills to explore themes that are important to us, such as identity, bullying, social media and body image. We've also had lots of fun playing games and learning how to work together as a team.

For this final half-term of the year, we have set the group the challenge to create something they would be happy to perform in front of others. They are working together to invent their own storylines, scenes and characters. They have taken to this so well and their creativity is really coming out. As I walk around the school, I often get stopped by group members in the corridors, asking if they can perform something to me (which I absolutely love!).

I started this group because I believe drama to be an incredibly effective tool to engage young people. Drama creates the opportunity for escapism, imagination, creative expression and also fun. A study commissioned by BBC Arts found that even a brief amount of time spent on a creative pastime can have powerful benefits for personal wellbeing<sup>1</sup>.

Not only that, the relationships built through drama allow for young people to gain support in their everyday lives.

In one of the sessions, a young person approached me at the beginning looking anxious. She asked if we could talk together later. There was not much time at the end of the session and I didn't want her to be late to her lesson so I walked her towards her next class. We talked together as we walked. She opened up about some relationship difficulties that she was facing. It's not easy for young people to talk about romantic relationships with an adult, and it was a privilege to be invited in.

After I listened I suggested that she might also try talking with her parents. I also tried to empower her to make the choice of what she wanted to do. The next week she said that the conversation at home had gone really well. Talking to me had given her confidence to share things with her mum and that had really helped her.

See? There's no drama... it's drama!

When I was 7 years old I took my first piano exam. Can you remember being seven? I'd not long progressed from velcro to shoe laces. I opened the exam room door and I saw the biggest room I had ever seen in my life. It was a theatre hall, and it felt like... >> >>...there were hundreds of steps down to reach a I thought it was a bomb! (The police officer reassured me that I'd "done the right thing"... what to them both was the examiner, watching, waiting for me.

We don't always think our clearest when we are experiencing anxiety. In fact, we're hardwired not to. When we're in the midst of that fight or flight to when we're in the midst of that fight or flight to. When we're in the midst of that fight or flight reflex, we can't engage the more critical thinking processes that our brain usually does so well. To think more clearly we need to reduce our anxiety level. There are things that you can do in the leage torm like talking to flight and a nee

What was happening to me? I was experiencing anxiety and it's actually a normal part of life. We all face things that make us feel anxious: whether it's an exam, or a sports game, or a school performance, or simply being in an unfamiliar situation. And anxiety in itself isn't bad— it's part of the fight or flight response that we all have as humans; it's the body's way of calling our attention to something that might be threatening to us, much like what a smoke alarm does.

A lot of the time this is a good thing. After all, smoke alarms save lives<sup>2</sup>. The problem is that they sometimes also go off when we've simply burnt our toast. In the same way, anxiety becomes a problem when it becomes too intense or lasts too long— when it starts to interfere with our daily life.

Around 8% of 11-16 year olds have an anxiety our brains, increasing the anxiety. When we face disorder<sup>3</sup>. Anxiety disorders are more commonly our fears (in a safe way and with the support of diagnosed in girls than in boys and prevalence others), we conquer them. tends to increase as young people grow older. At age 18, a staggering 13% of young people are If you know a young person who is affected by anxiety, there are many great sources of information likely to be experiencing an anxiety disorder of some kind<sup>2</sup>. This is when young people could be and help out there. Souster Youth works with sitting their A-levels, college exams or doing an young people in local secondary schools who are apprenticeship, for example. experiencing anxiety. You can also get support and advice from charities such as Young Minds<sup>4</sup>, as well as going to see your local GP.

I once actually called the police out at 3 o'clock in the morning to deal with a faulty smoke alarm. In the middle of the night, I heard a strange intermittent high-pitched beeping sound coming from my neighbour's garden. I tracked down the source of the sound to a black bin bag. My neighbour had moved out. No-one lived there any more. For some reason I suspected that it might have been an explosive device. Yes, that's right:

To think more clearly we need to reduce our anxiety level. There are things that you can do in the long term like talking to friends and loved ones, spending some time outdoors, doing hobbies that you enjoy, getting plenty of good rest, and chilled out activities like listening to music, doing some creative art or cuddling a pet. All of these activities can help lower our overall anxiety level so that when something comes along that might usually make us feel anxious, we feel more able to cope.

There are also things that we can do in the moment such as taking slow, deep breaths. We can bring our thoughts back into the present moment by using our senses and giving our brains something to focus upon. As an example, try listening out right now for five different sounds that you can hear.

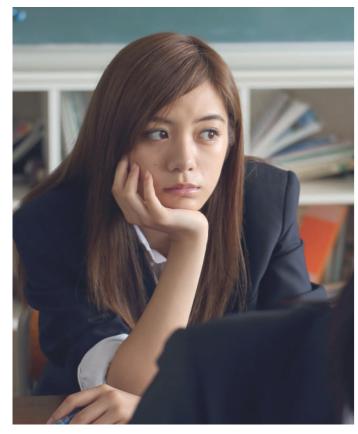

Counter-intuitively, we often also need to face up to the things and situations that are causing our anxiety, but in a controlled bit-by-bit way. Avoiding situations because we are feeling anxious reinforces the danger of that situation to our brains, increasing the anxiety. When we face our fears (in a safe way and with the support of others), we conquer them.

THE ASK-IT BASKET

Many people think of Italy as the birthplace of pasta. Our Italian friends have certainly done some beautiful things with pasta; lasagne, ravioli, pasta al forno, gnocchi... they're all so good! However, pasta was most likely born in China and has a history spanning thousands of years.

I wonder, have you ever stopped to consider your favourite pasta shape?

This isn't a new cookery section in our newsletter. I've been thinking about pasta because a young person asked me a question about it. My favourite type of . Why did God create dangerous animals but does pasta is fusilli, mostly because of the pasta-based puns you can make whilst eating it ("don't be so fusilli!").

A question about favourite pasta shape, while seemingly light-hearted, suggests an inquisitive mind and indicates an interest in others.

Just like considering your favourite pasta shape can lead to a fascinating culinary journey, asking thoughtprovoking questions can guide our young people to important life realisations. Whether they are about pasta, personal beliefs, or the quest for success, questions pave the way for learning and growth. Let me share a recent experience we had in a classroom of a local school.

We asked year 9 students at a local school to send us questions they wanted to discuss. They came back with all sorts of brilliant questions, from questions about pasta, to get-rich-quick schemes. The students also asked lots of questions about life and faith.

There were definitely some mischievous questions in there (and some that can't be repeated in a respectable publication like this one!). However, we tried to engage seriously with as many questions as possible. We found no reason why an enriching conversation shouldn't include topics as varied as hair care tips and the meaning of life!

Here are some of my favourite questions:

- not want us to harm them?
- Can you have faith if you have doubts?
- What do you think about Qatar?
- What do you do when you question your faith?
- How do I become rich at a young age?
- · Why should I have faith when there's no evidence for God?

These questions prompted conversations that don't seem to happen without a bit of encouragement. In the classes, we had free-flowing conversations as students responded to our answers. Instead of trying to get the students to think in exactly the same way as us, we were trying to stimulate their curiosity and give them food for thought.

In the first class, I was asked the question about becoming rich at a young age. I started by asking the students to draw themselves living 'the good life'. This provoked a conversation about what matters most safe and trusting environment. to them and whether the most valuable things in life can be purchased. Then I introduced them to the five This makes me ponder whether creating safer and more different types of wealth (financial, social, physical, trusting spaces could enhance many conversations mental, and time) and had them rank themselves on about the 'hot topics' in our culture. Respectful dialogue each one. I asked the students if they might already is so important, but perhaps it doesn't need to stifle be rich by virtue of living in the Western world. Some proper debate (whether about pasta, or the existence agreed, others still felt that a Bugatti would measurably of God). improve their lives. At the end of the lesson, many still For me, it highlights two things that seem important felt that wealth is an important aspect of a good life. in these kinds of conversations; first, the importance Others left with an expanded view of what might bring of respectful dialogue and, second, a willingness to value to life.

Another class spent more time discussing the evidence for God. We offered them two ideas that many Christians would find compelling; the natural world and the resurrection of Jesus. I asked the students what evidence would be enough to convince themmost said that seeing God face to face, or witnessing a miracle would remove all doubt.

Some of the students were even keen to carry on the conversations during breaktimes and lunches. It made significant issues. me wonder whether more of these conversations What kinds of questions are being asked by the young would happen if there were more opportunities to have people in your life? them in a safe way.

Our question and answer sessions with young people reminded me of a study by our friends at Youthscape and our experience chimed with much of what they found.

No Questions Asked<sup>1</sup> was a small-scale study, exploring 16 young people's big questions about God and religion. The study found little curiosity about these at first, with <sup>1</sup>You can download and read 'No Questions Asked' at young people expressing little interest in some of the the website https://www.youthscape.co.uk/research/ more abstract ideas we associate with apologetics and publications evangelism. However, over the course of the interview (and with some gentle persistence) young people did engage with some familiar questions around God, life after death, evil and suffering, and the purpose of life.

The research confirmed previous studies that showed young people had low religious literacy, confused ideas about God, and were focused on the happiness of themselves and their immediate friends and family.

Another aspect of this study that resonates with us is the idea that many young people think that questioning beliefs is disrespectful. In our work, we find that many young people have learned the importance of respecting the beliefs and opinions of others. Yet it also seems to me that questioning beliefs is a really important part of finding the truth about almost anything. That's why I was keen to engage with as many questions as I possibly could, even the less serious ones. By engaging with the trivial questions, I think we earned the right to lead discussions on the questions that seemed to matter more. We created a take the risk of sharing our opinion and opening up to challenge and debate. My experience in classrooms recently gives me hope for the future of these types of conversations and confirms the willingness of young people to have them.

Much like how a playful question about favourite pasta shapes can open doors to deeper discussions, the questions from the young people around you may be leading towards insightful conversations about life's
